

How All Japan Pro Wrestling Survived The Year 2000 Roster Split

All Japan Pro Wrestling (AJPW) was one of the most popular professional wrestling promotions in the world in the 1990s. The promotion was home to some of the biggest stars in the industry, including Mitsuharu Misawa, Toshiaki Kawada, and Kenta Kobashi. However, in 2000, the promotion was rocked by a roster split that saw many of its top stars leave for rival promotion Pro Wrestling NOAH.

The roster split was caused by a number of factors, including financial problems and disagreements over the direction of the promotion. AJPW had been losing money for several years, and the promotion's management was desperate to find a way to cut costs. The promotion also had a number of disagreements over the direction of the promotion. Some wrestlers, such as Misawa and Kawada, wanted AJPW to focus on a more traditional style of wrestling. Other wrestlers, such as Kobashi, wanted AJPW to adopt a more modern style of wrestling.

The roster split was a major blow to AJPW. The promotion lost many of its top stars, and the promotion's morale was at an all-time low. However, AJPW was able to survive the roster split and went on to become one of the most successful wrestling promotions in Japan.

There are a number of reasons why AJPW was able to survive the roster split. First, the promotion had a strong foundation. AJPW had been around for over 30 years, and the promotion had a loyal fan base. Second, the promotion had a number of talented wrestlers who were willing to step up and lead the promotion. Third, the promotion's management was able to make some key changes that helped to improve the promotion's financial situation.

AJPW's survival is a testament to the strength of the promotion and its fans. The promotion was able to overcome a major crisis and go on to become one of the most successful wrestling promotions in Japan. AJPW's story is an inspiration to all wrestling fans, and it shows that anything is possible if you have the heart and the determination to succeed.
